

Seeking A Career That Can Be Richly Rewarding?

Sandy Reed, RN, BSN

Vice President, Business Development/Workforce Employment Solutions

Are you at a crossroads in your healthcare career? Perhaps you're unemployed because of downsizing, or maybe you just want to leave the rat race behind. Either way, you wonder where you go from here. You still have so much to give, but the thought of committing to another permanent position is anything but appealing. Becoming an interim opens up a whole new world that is yours for the taking, including the opportunity to:

Experience adventure and travel. Have you ever thought, "Someday I'll travel and see the world?" Do the reasons that once held you back no longer exist? Maybe your kids are grown and gone, or maybe you're single and tired of waiting for life to come find you. Interims have the opportunity to be adventuresome, experience other cultures, and explore different parts of the country and even the world.

Serve as a consultant and a change agent. Interims aren't just seat-warmers. They're driven, results-oriented thought experts who perform in-depth assessments, prioritize initiatives and put their recommendations to work for organizations. You may not see every project to fruition, but you leave the client with a roadmap to continue your efforts toward sustainable, efficient improvements.

Experience true work/life balance. Healthcare executive leadership carries with it responsibility 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. There is no time when you're not a mere phone call away. As an interim, you will have more of a work/life balance, with time to pursue activities that matter to you. At the end of each engagement, you decide when you want to work again. You have absolute freedom — with no monkey on your back.

Achieve career and personal growth. Being an interim is a fabulous opportunity to grow, both personally and professionally. Each assignment exposes you to different leaders, projects and exciting healthcare environments. Your knowledge level increases with each assignment, and you learn from each positive and negative situation you experience. Each healthcare organization has challenges waiting to be conquered with a fresh, knowledgeable perspective. Interims have a lot to give — and they're excited about giving it.
